A Debate at the Oxford Union

11 December 2018

In a world of disruptive economic change, with unprecedented challenges from global warming, social inequality and corporate governance, how best can capital markets receive the information they need to function properly?

Environmental, social and governance (ESG) information is increasingly important for investors to understand the sustainability of economic performance, and to make investment decisions accordingly. Yet the disclosure of this sustainability-related 'nonfinancial' information is neither standardised nor regulated, as is the norm for financial reporting. Our debate asks whether standard setters such as the U.S. Financial Accounting Standards Board (FASB) and the International Accounting Standards Board (IASB) should be given responsibility for setting standards for nonfinancial information, and if corporate 'greenwash' is otherwise inevitable.

Our question is reasonable to ask, since both IASB and FASB are expert in setting standards for information on company performance used by investors. Furthermore, through legislation and regulation, almost every listed company in the world must conform to one of these sets of standards. This is a mandate that no institution has with respect to corporate nonfinancial reporting. If it were extended, it is possible that nonfinancial information would have the same credibility and utility as financial information. Or not; the question is open for debate.
